It's common to make mistakes when typing. Because almost everyone makes them, some people don't care about them. However, a small mistake can turn into a big problem.

Typing errors, even a small one, can do a lot of damage. A bank in Germany learned that the hard way. In 2015, a clerk typed too many zeros on a deal, and the bank lost six billion US dollars. Many people lost respect for the bank because of this and chose to save their money in other banks.

Another famous example happened in the USA. On July 22, 1962, NASA sent out a space probe. People were watching it go up when it blew up in front of their eyes. NASA later found what caused the accident: a "-" was typed by mistake in the computer code. This code typo cost 80 million dollars.

Typing errors do matter. The examples above show how serious they can be. This is why people must be careful when typing.

Unnecessary Inventions

Necessity is the mother of invention. However, Matty Benedetto works on special things, unnecessary inventions. Unnecessary inventions are the works of Matty Benedetto. In the past two years, he made over 280 new inventions to solve strange problems - the problems don't exist. Each week in his office in Burlington Vermont, Matty makes 1-3 new things by 3D printing, wood working, and many other skills.

His idea comes from having fun. "Not everything has to be serious, and I want to bring these inventions to life just because I want to!" For example, there is an invention called "tear-rings." It's a pair of rings with tissue paper. So when you are crying, you can get tissue paper from your "tear-rings." Well, you can just get tissue paper from other places, but, this is the point: to solve strange problems - the problems don't exist.
